anywhere?

Bialkowski also has a creative interpretation of our rights. Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are OK for blacks as long as they know their place, on the black side of town.

The sickening thing about this article is that I know many Rochesterians will agree with him. My mother taught me to judge people by who they are, not what color their skin is. If more people did the same, white and black alike, the world would be a much happier place.

Ban the Klan

I READ of the Ku Klux Klan wanting to have a chapter here (Times-Union, June 28).

I am appalled that we would allow such horrible people to exist. My in-laws' family was wiped out by the Nazi party. I can't understand why we allow these groups whose only purpose is to hate.

Topfree is no big deal

I'VE read the letters written about the arrest of the topfree protesters. The writers are correct in a sense: There are bigger problems in the world to report on; the police should be put to better use than arresting peaceful picnickers.

I believe that's the whole point of the topfree protesters: What's the big deal about not wearing a shirt?

Yes, let's focus on more important issues and have our police force out fighting real crime instead of arresting a woman for wearing exactly what the man next to her is!

Let them be topfree and let's get on with more important issues!

Which laws? Whose order?

I FIND the light sentence of Oliver North and the reaction to it very interesting. Look who's applauding the slap on the wrist: the same people who support law and order candidates, or who run themselves, on law and order platforms.

But whose laws have they been sounding off about? I would have thought, to hear them, that it was the law of the land, our laws, our land.

I think before voters in the future are taken in again by these apple pi and motherhood claims, they would well to discover whether the candid they support is in favor of the law that govern all of us, the same la all, or only those laws that they and want to obey.

It appears that what our elec leaders are saying is that law a der is for the common folk, bu they are above it and can pic choose.

We have witnessed much of disgraceful behavior, call politics, if you will, in the p I can only wonder when an will end, and whether we again elect leaders that w proud of.
